2. These cards have not been so numerous that they present any special problem to the analyst; they are far easier to handle than the large volume of low-grade collateral that passes across his desk every day. Most analysts would prefer to see these [redacted] than risk missing an important fragment of information.

3. We are naturally unable to assign any absolute scale of value to this [redacted] or suggest what publication priority they should be given. If an attempt is being made to cut down on the production of these cards, one feasible approach might be to publish only those that appear to bear on the higher priority subjects, such [redacted]
